How is it possible to describe the city of the future? Which are the unusual actors that are currently designing the contemporary city? And how do their actions influence new productions at urban scale? How enabling technologies are changing the ways of life in the city, in the design of new uses, new languages, new behaviors, new experiences? Does time represent the fourth dimension of design for the city? And is this design factor really assume a priority role over the physical / spatial one?

The “MUTATIONS” Research Workshop. Design for Continuous and Sustainable Cities deals with the contemporary city and urban changes, investigating the processes of continuous transformation of the city. According to the need to integrate social, economic and environmental development aspects (17 Sustainable Development Goals), the workshop aims to investigate the potential of the “continuous city”, in which the single dynamics of mutation at urban scale becomes part of an evolving system, and to define a new design approach, capable of intercepting the phenotypic changes of the city, assumed as a turbulent and perennial field of action. It is no longer the structure of the city to be investigated, but the superstructure, made up of people, relationships, new uses.
